Fallen Fruit (David Burns, Matias Viegener and Austin Young). Fruit Machine, 2009. Video, variable configuration.

Catharine Clark Gallery presents Fruit Machine, our first exhibit of the work of the art collaboration, Fallen Fruit. Fallen Fruit is a participatory art group focused on fruit, urban space and public life. Since 2004, when Fallen Fruit began mapping fruit trees growing on and over public property in Los Angeles, the group has expanded their work to include videos, serialized public projects and site-specific installations in various cities around the world.

This exhibit in the gallery's media room consists of the video Fruit Machine, an on-going project in which the artists capture teenagers (between the ages of 12-17) eating a variety of fruit. The videos are screened in various configurations, varying from single-channel to three to five in a row--referencing a slot machine (where fruit is the jackpot). A study in how we actually eat, the portraits range from graceful to awkward and comical, as the teenagers navigate what they quickly come to realize is a not-so-simple task.

Fallen Fruit seeks "to use fruit as a common denominator to change the way you see the world." Their other visual work, an example of which will also be featured in the exhibit, includes an ongoing series of narrative photographs, wallpapers, everyday objects and video works that explore the social and political implications of our relationship to fruit and world around us. Working with fruit as a primary material or medium, the artist's catalogue of projects and works reimagine public interactions within the margins of urban space, systems of community, and narrative, real-time experience.

Fallen Fruit will participate in a panel discussion with other surprise guest speakers at Swine and Swill, a ticketed dinner and event at Catharine Clark Gallery, on Sunday, May 4, from 5:00-8:00pm.
